loving, tending, feeding faith in the 21st century

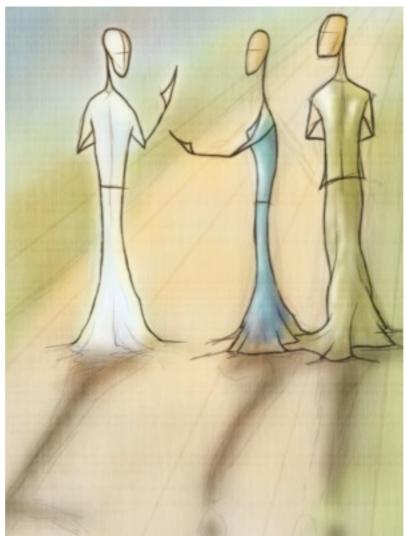

september 24, 2012 ames, iowa / synod assembly you'll remember...

- part one: a theological frame for faith formation in the 21st century
- part two: pragmatic ways to "feed my sheep" in the midst of digital cultures

food, faith and media: an analogy outline

- faith formation happens most at home, how do pastoral leaders support and engage?
- this is an adaptive challenge
- key to understanding media is understanding practice
- best analogy might be to food
- what are good practices?
- some practice with the analogy...

adaptive challenge

messy, no clear answer or technique will suffice, changing contexts, learning together so we learn...

with our congregations
with families
with children with each other basic assumptions about faith

we know that faith has to be nurtured at home, although community is essential

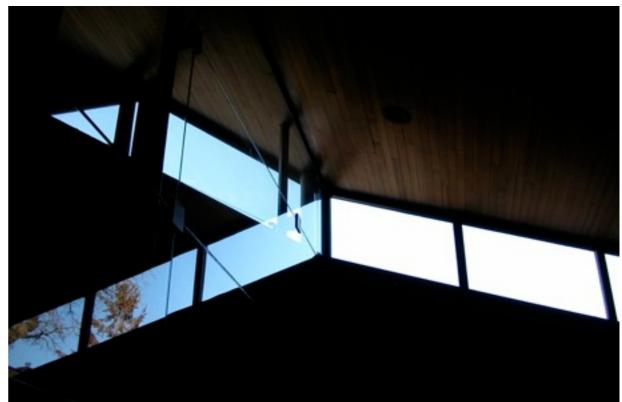

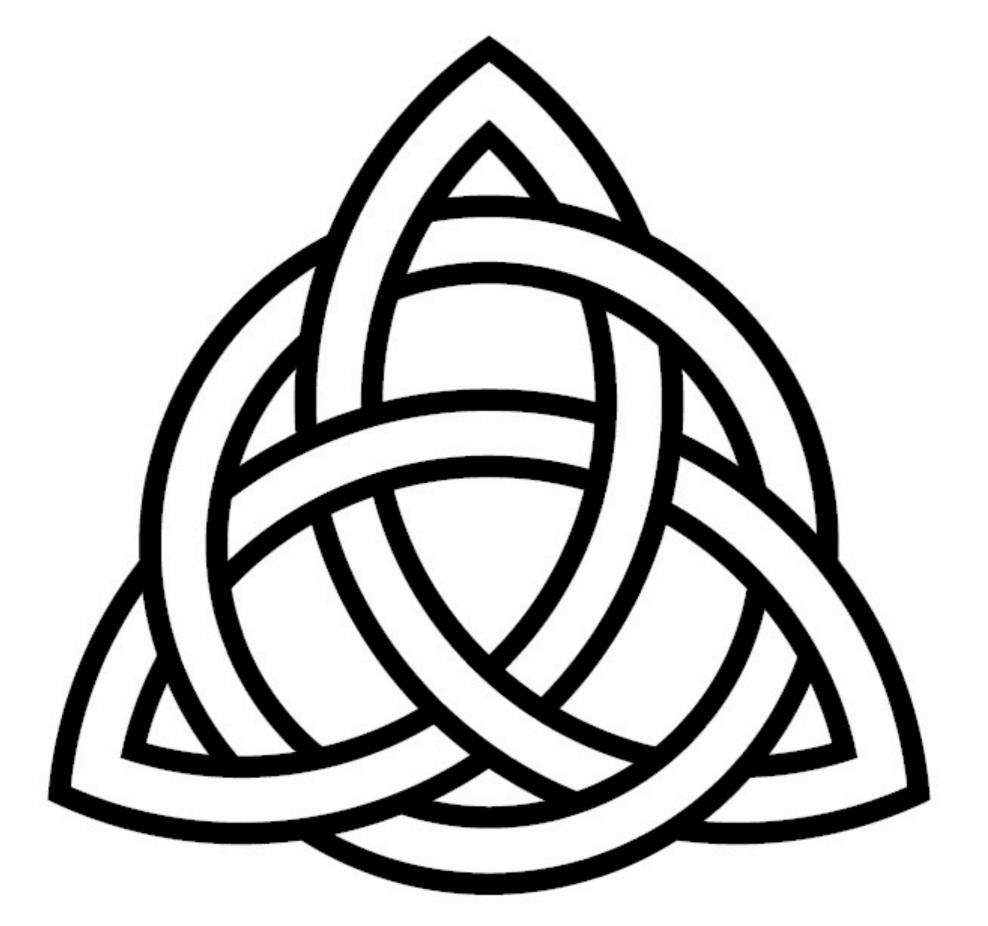

we know that practices matter, in terms of exercise or practice of something as way to learn (not as a means of redemption or grace)

God is always the primary Agent in the community of truth

we are made in the image of God, a God who is communicative within Godself, and in communication with all of God's Creation and so we turn to media...

to understand media you need to understand practice media practice is about communication and relationality analogies?

best one might be to food

food

- we all require it to survive
- we are embedded in a culture that offers us a lot of unhealthy choices
- the artful practices of preparing and eating food are stressed if not extinct
- no clear social consensus

media

- we require communication to survive
- we are offered a lot of unhealthy communication practices
- artful practices of preparing and engaging in communication are stressed if not extinct
- no clear social consensus

so what are we to do?

analogies

- help people develop healthy practices around media
- encourage a diverse media diet
- encourage the production of media
- provide ways to share more communally in consuming preproduced media
- highlight our unique media

some examples, NOT definitive!

for young children

- limit commercially produced media consumption
- for the times you do engage media, put good pieces in front of them (Common Good radio, Children's literature, etc.)
- institute table prayers and practices (candles, etc.)
- invite a biblical imagination into daily practice (Bible Stories for the 40 days)

for school age kids

- invite them to create media (MyPopStudio, animoto, etc.)
- watch media together
- have clear family practices around media use
- diversify your media diet
- choose media with deep theological themes to engage together
- choose Wii or Kinect over more solitary or less physical options for teens

- play and learn online together
- set clear guidelines for family media use
- provide opportunities to create in media
- practice open and engaged communication in any medium
- engage in service together
- participate with them in social media

for adults

- choose the Net over cable tv
- develop a thoughtful news diet
- learn with young people
- create in media

for pastoral leaders

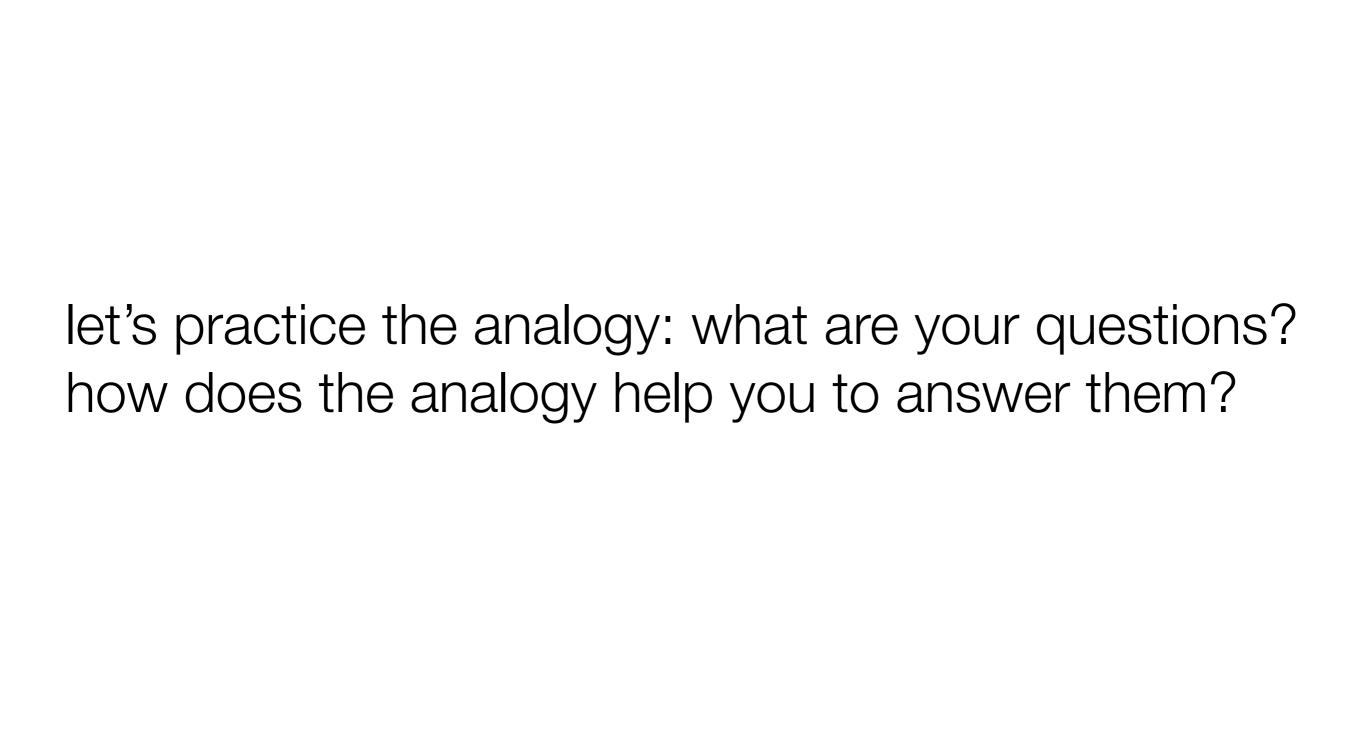

- learn what your community is engaging and join them there
- mind your own media diet (subscribe to a variety of news and pastoral resources)
- encourage media creation
- hone the unique media of faith community

ELIZABETH DRESCHER & KEITH ANDERSON

remember

- practices by which we engage media are more determinative than media content
- emerging technologies make engaging media an adaptive challenge
- we confess a Trinitarian God, communicative within Godself, and in relationship with Creation
- we need to support people with media in ways that we support healthy food practices
- support your congregation with faith practices that engage and produce media

more info: mhess@luthersem.edu