

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

It's difficult to express adequately my gratitude to all of the people who have helped me walk along this path, completing the first stage of this journey.

My committee — Mary Boys, Brinton Lykes, John McDargh — have been with me throughout. They have struggled, endured, learned, enjoyed and celebrated with me as I have tried to articulate my questions and search for answers to them. Although I am solely responsible for this piece of writing, it would not be what it is without them.

The workshop participants, who will remain nameless here, were a wonderful set of collaborators. Without them this research would not exist, nor would its conclusions be as useful.

My colleagues at the Institute of Religious Education and Pastoral Ministry at Boston College, students and faculty alike, were lively conversation partners, even when — perhaps especially when! — they weren't sure how mass-mediated popular culture could hold any relevance for religious educators.

The Women's Theology Circle of Columbus, Ohio, now long dispersed to other parts, gave me the experience of lively dialogue with talented women, and supported me in deciding that returning to school could be its own kind of activism on behalf of justice.

It is said that it "takes a village to raise a child." In my case, it has taken some very special people who have helped along the way, in particular, Susan LaViolette, Michelle Homer, and Jenny Edmundsen.

Finally, once in a great while people come into your life who provide support, encouragement, and active challenge in just the right amounts to make growth possible. There are three women in particular I need to thank.

Leslie Ann Kern was there at the very beginning, as I struggled to believe that I could undertake this kind of task. Without her steady, patient presence I would not have taken myself seriously enough to begin this journey.

Addie Loraine Walker was already in the program when I began it. Her joyous laughter still rings in my ears as I think of her, and her belief in the validity of my questions sustains me. She not only writes about the practice of transformative dialogue, she engages in it. She has been a true mentor to me.

Carol Becker became a partner in my journey later in the process, but I would not have finished this without her. She is the best kind of midwife, challenging me not only to complete the intellectual aspects of this labor, but to do the emotional work it required as well.

And finally, there are not words adequate to the task of saying “thank you” to my life partner, Eric Celeste, who has been with me from before I even believed I would go back to school, and has made it possible to take on the often quixotic task of pursuing a PhD while also parenting two small children.

To all of you, my deepest thanks.
